As the name suggests, this is the do-it-all tool that professionals use to create top-end video. As such, this is not cheap, paid for on a subscription model. If you only do video editing, you can opt for the one app subscription, but if you're performing other creative tasks, you'd better request a full Adobe Creative Cloud subscription. Whatever you go for, Premiere Pro CC offers everything you want, from basic trimming and layering to 8K and 360-degree video editing support - assuming your machine has the power to perform that. It works on both Mac and Windows and is packed with keyboard shortcuts to make the process easy to use. There's also an option to upload directly to YouTube, making this a one-stop shop for any self-publishing social media creators out there. If you work with many people-based videos, the smart toning is a great feature for the skin - a bit like how a selfie camera looks smoother skinned. This helps to give the videos a more professional finish. And for the pros you enjoy effects like chroma-keying, coverage, transitions and more. Something for everyone, then. (Image credit: Lightworks) If you're looking for the best free video editing software, we recommend Lightworks. There are also small extras such as the ability to add text annotations and even edit them at frame and subframe levels. All of that is free, so even if you're not sure if we'd say give this one a go as it will more than likely meet the needs of most, even the more demanding editor.
